The Orioles don't have a lot of players left to trade, but the organization has three notable names on the market that they would consider moving. Danny Valencia, the shortstop, has been a part of the Orioles' core for the past few seasons and was a quality hitter when healthy. The Orioles do not have a shortstop in camp, and the staff has recently started working him out at second base. There is no indication they are going to move him. But they aren't going to hold him onto the roster just for the sake of it. The other two players on the market are outfielder Steve Pearce and catcher Matt Wieters. Pearce was the best player on the Orioles' last-place team in 2018 and is a terrific hitter who is used to the pressure of a postseason. He is just 28 years old, and he isn't going to be considered a part of the future of the organization. But the Orioles would consider moving him if they can add a veteran outfielder to their major league roster. There's one thing holding Pearce back. Pearce doesn't have a World Series ring. General manager Mike Elias has said the Orioles are not really interested in a player without a World Series ring, though they've had that mindset in the past. W
