Hydrophobicity of a molecule is generally determined experimentally, either by measurement of a partition coefficient or by calculation of a ClogP. In this work, a number of computational models have been used to estimate the partition coefficient and ClogP of the four drugs of the CART and AMD datasets, namely, vinblastine, amodiaquine, artemisinin, and artemether. The structure-property models used in this study include the additive, the linear combination, the rotatable bond, the solvation-dependent, and the linear regression. From the four methods, the additive model is shown to be superior in predicting the partition coefficient of vinblastine. For amodiaquine, the linear combination model predicts the partition coefficient with slightly better results than the additive and rotatable bond models. For artemisinin, the linear combination model gives the best ClogP predictions. Overall, the linear combination model and the additive model have the best performance. Thioredoxin-1 (Trx-1) is a 12-kDa redox-active protein with a redox-sensitive disulfide, which is an active component in the antioxidant system. Trx-1 is also known to induce cell cycle arrest, apoptosis, and differentiation, resulting in the anticancer effect. Trx-1 was first isolated from Escherichia coli (Sekhon et al., J. Biol. Chem., 272, 9257-9262 (1997)). Its mRNA and protein were also detected in the ovary, testis, and heart, and its expression level was increased
