"No." "Selling the recording is illegal, isn't it?" "No, not if I do it myself." "That's really a shame." 6be7b61caf "I took a stupid photograph of a stack of £2 coins and showed it around my work place to prove a point. I was told it was disgusting, and I was fired. Nathan Howley I started a photography business in my basement for almost ten years before I put an ad in the local paper. We even had a waiting list. I found that my 16MP phone, or my iPhone 4, had just enough oomph to get the job done. I started keeping my camera at work and went from there. I used to work for a film company and would always travel with a camera, to give and receive. If they were shooting me then I was the one making them feel as if I was there. They were my audience and I needed to be a good show for them. I started photographing weddings in 2007 and it made me fall in love with photography all over again. It made me want to know everything I could about photography, so I started going to classes, and that's when the adventure began. I took a few classes in Photoshop, but once I got my feet wet I couldn't stop. I have always thought that "learn it and make it yourself" was the best approach. I would travel to Apple stores and take classes to learn more about how to operate Apple products and the software that ran on them. While I was doing that I would look up the software in books or find online tutorials to further my skills. If I couldn't find it then I would either buy the book myself or I would ask a friend. Throughout my career I have had many photographers ask me what programs or equipment I use and I tell them Photoshop and Lightroom. I have worked on film for almost two decades now, so it is very important to me that I
