Bookmark the permalink. 1.3.3.3.3.4. Chapter 1: The battlefield We will use a fictitious war to illustrate some of the principles involved. To begin with, we will assume that the conflict is being fought over territory. The battlefield will be taken as a geographical area. A battle is not an independent unit or event. It is not an isolated act of violence, but is part of a wider, continually changing, relationship between opposing armies. This conflict will take place in a large geographic area, such as North or Central Europe. Only a very small proportion of the people living there are directly involved in the war. Most of the people involved in the war are civilians and combatants, who are not directly connected to the war. The participants in this conflict are generally divided into two groups, the combatants and the civilians. The combatants are people who have taken up arms or have been conscripted into the army. They are fighting against each other, not against civilians. The people who are not participating in the battle are generally in no way involved with it. They are not directly affected by the war. 2.2.3.3.4. Chapter 2: War and states The main unit of war in a modern European country is the army. This army is comprised of citizens who are generally called volunteers, conscripts or draftees, depending on the country. 2.2.3.3.4.1. The role of the civilian In modern warfare, the role of the civilian is very different from that of a hundred years ago. In ancient times,
