Modular electrical connector assemblies are generally constructed in two halves. The two halves are mated together to form a connector unit. Each half is formed of a dielectric material, for example, an insulator. Usually, the two halves are integrally connected together by a metal tab or rivet member. In other assemblies, a first dielectric half with a plurality of conductor members is permanently embedded within a second dielectric half and secured in position therein by a snap-in fastening means or a similar form of fastener. When one connector is to be used in an electrical circuit and another in another circuit, the two connector halves are mated together to form a double modular connector. In any of these cases, the connector halves may be combined in various numbers, depending upon the number of circuits involved. As the number of circuits increases, the connector halves and associated fasteners become cumbersome and difficult to handle and assemble. In addition, the cost of the connector halves increases. If the connector halves are separate from the circuits, then the connector halves and associated fasteners must be enclosed within a protective housing, which adds to the overall size of the electrical connector. With the permanent connection of the connector housing to the individual connector half, the same is less flexible than desired. If the housing is to be replaced by a different housing having a different connector configuration, then the permanent housing must be replaced. This requires that the entire assembly be disassembled, that the old housing be replaced by the new housing, and then the individual electrical components of the connector be re-assembled. This is a rather time-consuming procedure.Q: Live stream of user connected UDP listener in Java Let's say I have following UDP Server: public class UDPChat
