Microsoft Office 365 Tutorials 2019 - Step by step Guide and Best Practices (in.Mar 24, 2019 .If your C.R. is what you're looking for then this is what you want. It's a low-trajectory rotor that's easy to fly on the ground and in the air. It does great at low speed and there's a little more wind "fuel" to it than most of the higher-trajectory C.R.s. If you're not new to RC I'd stick with a high-trajectory rotor, but the great thing about the C.R. is that even though it's not low-trajectory like a Stratus it doesn't have the same torque-over-speed that some of the higher-trajectory rotors have. Price: $49.99 What is a really good one? Think about it... And yeah, I should have went to a real school, maybe a third world school or something. They came out with a rediculusly wonderful chopper that is like a middle ground between low/mid-trajectory and high/tele-trajectory. It doesn't have as much torque as the mid-/high-trajectory rotors, and it doesn't have the excessive torque that the low-trajectory rotors have, but it has a very moderate rate of torque increase at lower speeds. If you're not new to RC and you're not looking for super-torque-on-demand, this is a great rotor for you. price: $34.99 I hate to be a buzzkill, but remember that this is NOT a high-trajectory rotor. It's not like a Stratus or BladeRunner where the torque is just immense. It actually has a nice increase in torque at lower speeds like a Stratus. If you do choose a C.R. for your first, then do yourself a favor and get something easy to fly. It's easy to mess up a C.R.
