The importance of including psychosocial factors in evaluating the quality of life of the individual is emphasized by L.G. Fulford (Life Quality in Psychosomatic Medicine, 1992). A patient's psychosocial profile in general is assessed by a family doctor, psychiatrist, or psychologist in relation to the doctor's diagnoses. The term quality of life is generally defined as "the perception of the patient as to the value of his or her life" (Strizzi et al., European Neuropsychological Society Abstract, 2002). We use the following definition: "Quality of life is the perception of a patient of his or her overall quality of life, while 'disease-specific' quality of life refers to the particular aspects of quality of life that are affected by a disease." This definition has been used in the last European Survey of Health Status and Health Related Quality of Life (EUROHEAD-QOL) (Frank et al., European Psychosomatic Medicine, 1993) and is referred to in the following guidelines by the World Health Organization (WHO) (Report of the WHO Expert Committee on Population and Development, 1993). The assessment of quality of life includes self-assessment and evaluation by others. Many instruments have been developed for the assessment of quality of life. This article deals with one instrument, the Satisfaction With Life Scale (SWLS) (Diener et al., 1985; Diener and Emmons, 1985). The instrument was developed and validated by Diener and colleagues in 1985 and was later translated into many languages, including German, Swedish, English, and French. The SWLS is a 10-item instrument that was developed by Diener (1975). The scale includes two questions: (1) "Overall, how satisfied are you with your life?" and (2) "Can you imagine a life that would be more satisfying than the one you have?" The score varies from 10 ("very dissatisfied"
