Deleted or inactive Windows registry keys and entries that remain in the registry can be reinstalled and removed from the Windows registry that may lead to a slow start up of Windows, programs not working and other issues. Accidental deletion of registry keys can cause problems in your Windows system, program not functioning properly, a slowdown in system performance and even Blue Screen of Death (BSOD). System startup usually takes longer to start, programs that normally start up faster do not run correctly, and errors are more prevalent. To solve this issue, the application's RegCleaning Tool can scan the Windows registry for deleted or disabled registry keys and entries. The program scans every Windows registry key, folder, value, entry, and section. You can specify which Windows registry keys you want to delete or delete multiple registry keys at once. Before deleting all registry keys, the program scans the system. Since registry keys and files may be hidden in the Windows registry, they are usually not listed in the Windows explorer. Registry keys or values that are not in the list of active registry keys may not be viewed. Detailed report with the registry key, section, and value are provided after scanning. The scan time depends on the number of Windows registry keys and files the system has. Note: • The user may need to reboot after the cleaning is complete and the registry keys and files have been added to the Windows registry for you to see the changes. • You can select the option to clean the Windows registry on demand. • The program will not remove the deleted registry keys and files. Just click Run and specify one or more Windows registry keys and the program will scan the Windows registry and look for deleted or inactive registry keys, values, subkeys, and subvalues. You can select to show registry keys, values, subkeys, or subvalues by default. The program may also delete the inactive registry keys and files. After the scan is complete, a detailed report of all registry keys and files is provided. The user may remove the deleted or inactive registry keys, values, subkeys, or subvalues. There is no need to reboot system after the registry cleaning. RegCleaning Tool is an advanced utility that identifies unused or deleted Windows registry keys and values and cleanup registry by deleting the keys and values. This tool was designed for advanced users, however there is no risk of damaging files with the interface being accessible for users of all skill levels.
